The gantries straddled at least five railroad tracks, and the grain was discharged into railroad cars on these tracks. A steel hopper, which could be transported by cranes, fed the grain into holes on the sides of the railroad cars. The concrete-faced quay was about three feet above water level and the nearest railroad track lay eight to 10 feet from the edge of the quay. At the port office a control tower similar to those used at airfields, directs harbor traffic. On top of this control tower is mounted a parabolic radar antenna six to eight feet long and two feet wide.
